7,500 TEXTILE WORKERS STRIKE

Lawrence, Mass., March 31.—Seven thousand five hundred textile operators in seven cotton mills here left their work without disorder today in protest against a wage reduction approximating 20 per cent. An additional 7,000 workers were idle as the result of a shut-down of the Arlington mills. The strike marked the spread to this textile center of the controversy that has tied up the cotton industry in Rhode Island and New Hampshire for several weeks.

Organizers of the United Textile Workers of America, who took charge of the situation said 80 per cent of the workers were out and that the results had been far beyond their expectations, in view of the fact that a week ago the operatives were only loosely organized. Leaders of the one big union, which also is interested in the strike, claimed that their organization had gained strength. Ben Legere, a member of the union's executive board, predicted last week that although the union would start the strike, his organization would finish it.

Legere, at a conference late today with Francis Gorman and John J. Dean, organizers of the United Textile Workers, made the suggestion that the two unions combine for the purpose of conducting the strike here. Gorman and Dean said they thought favorably of the proposition and would submit it at once to President Thomas, and McMahon, of the U. T. W., and the executive board.

The mill owners also expressed satisfaction with the situation and said they had expected the walkout to assume larger proportions. Officials of the Pacific Mills, the largest of the plants affected, said the mills would reopen tomorrow. The Everett Mills will also open, it was announced.

Only one plant was forced to close today. The Methuen Co., at Methuen, just over the Lawrence line, suspended operations when no workers reported. At the other six plants, the looms were run with reduced forces.

MEASLES

Measels is a little easier to diagnose than scarlet fever, because, while there are many things that cause a red rash like that of scarlet fever, there are few that cause the spotted, pimply rash of measles with running from the eyes and nose and a fever. This should be recognized by anyone who has had a little experience with sickness as well as by the doctor.

The most important thing about measles is that tuberculosis of the lungs often follows it and that acute broncho-pneumonia sometimes complicates it with fatal results. The old-time feeling that the so-called "children's disease" were simple things and that the child might just as well have them all and get it over has vanished before the knowledge that many children die from these "simple" ailments and that many more are handicapped for life by defects resulting from even a mild attack sometimes. No one should ever needlessly expose a child to any disease, because with care many people go through life without having these children's diseases and their general health is probably much better for it.

Measels predispose to tuberculosis, presumably because it weakens the resistance of the child at a time when he is very susceptible to infection of any kind, and because tuberculosis is one of the commonest kinds of infection and the germs are almost always present in any environment. According to the "Layman's Handbook of Medicine" there is no reason to believe that there is any particular association between the germs of measles and tuberculosis, but the child is very susceptible to any infection after an attack of measles and tuberculosis is the thing with which he is most apt to come into contact. Children are peculiarly susceptible to tuberculosis, anyway, so that in his weakness after measles, the child is more apt to contract it than anything else.

There is no specific treatment for measles. The other members of the family must be protected from infection and the patient must be protected, as far as possible from complications. When fever is present, the diet should, of course, always be of the simplest, and everything should be done to keep the child in the best possible general condition of health, so as to increase his resistance to after infections.
